

How would your business benefit from a Windows-based tablet?

Recently, Tech Radar came out with a list of the top seven tablets running Windows 10, with reviews of their features and advantages. While this kind of list is handy for making a decision about which tablet to buy, you'll first have to ask yourself how your business would benefit from a Windows-based tablet.

In what ways can Windows-based tablets help you work more productively and contribute to your company's success? The advantages to choosing them over other models (such as Android devices) include the following:

Computing power. Windows-based tablets draw on a powerful operating system and allow you to work more easily with programs that demand greater computing resources. You can also readily run different apps at the same time and work with more than one app on-screen. If you want your employees to regularly use tablets for varied work purposes beyond checking emails or performing other light functions, Windows-based devices are a great pick.

Choice of devices. You enjoy a wider selection of Windows-based devices, meaning you can more easily tailor your purchase to your business's needs and budget constraints. There are all kinds of features to consider. For example, some devices are hybrids between tablets and laptops; they may have keyboards that detach from the device or slide out from it. There's also a wide variety of screen sizes.

Adaptable for different environments. In a variety of locations, you can turn your tablet into a kind of office computer by plugging it in to other devices to enhance its capabilities. Connect it to a docking station, or hook it up to an external storage unit. (Devices will differ in the number of USB ports they have.)

One of the main points to remember about Windows-based tablets is that they can give you the kind of capabilities you'd associate with a laptop - a tremendously beneficial quality for a work-related device.
